

Iraq

Anthony Lombardo, a Deputy Inspector with the NYPD and former Army Operations Sergeant, was involved in military operations at Camp Bucca and Abu Ghraib, two detention facilities in Iraq. Camp Bucca was a large U.S. military base containing a military prison in southern Iraq, primarily holding detainees during the Iraq War, while Abu Ghraib, a prison located near Baghdad, became infamous for the abuse and torture of prisoners. Lombardo served with the 310th MP Battalion, 800th MP Brigade at Camp Bucca and attended briefings at Abu Ghraib. Although he was not charged with any wrongdoing, Lombardo was part of the chain of command when detainee mistreatment occurred. The Taguba Report, a document that investigated the actions of the 800th military police brigade, later concluded that a "pervasive command climate" in the 800th MP Brigade contributed to the loss of accountability and abuse of detainees in both facilities.

Currently, Lombardo serves with the NYPD's Strategic Response Group, which is responsible for handling citywide protests. He has been accused of using tactics learned in Iraq to 'manage' demonstrations in New York, including the Occupy Wall Street and Black Lives Matter protests. In Nigro v. The City of New York, Lombardo was a named defendant in a case where the city settled for $165,000 after the plaintiff Nigro alleged that officers violated his civil rights during a protest. Similarly, in Adsluf v. The City of New York, the city settled for $40,000 following claims that officers, including Lombardo, unlawfully used force and violated constitutional rights at an Occupy Wall Street protest. Activists have also claimed that Lombardo has targeted individuals, especially those filming police actions, during protests.
